Debauchery as a Hamlet.

The mayor of Well-known town in Blankshire became the patron of the theatre under Mr. M.—y's management, in 1850, and gave a hundred guineas for a box for the season. This liberality did not arise from any particular taste for dramatic literature, or any other kind of literature; but he paid thus handsomely for the box because he was a liberal man, liked going to the play, and his friends had been so long going that he thought he would not be outdone. He attended every night, was always pleased, and very friendly with the manager, and one night Mr. M.—y made his appearance in Hamlet, it play which, though the mayor had never seen; and when in the mad scene, Hamlet appeared with his dress in a disorder, the mayor took offence at the exhibition, and declared to his wife and family that he was in the box to see a play, and that the actor was drunk, and he would have no such things if he could help it. So, accordingly, he went round to the stage, and waited at the side till the end of the scene when he thus addressed the tragedian:—"Mr. M.—y, till to-night I looked upon you as a respectable man, and now I see you are given to drink, for no sober man would give me a respectable actor in his shirt and frill looking like that, and his shirt and frill hanging down. Why, you ought to be ashamed of yourself." The tragedian, astonished at the ignorance of his patron, said, "My dear sir, you are quite mistaken. I assure you. I only adhere to the author's instructions in respect to the disordered dress, to show—"

"Who wrote this play?" demanded the mayor. "Good gracious!" exclaimed the actor, "you know that I wrote it, don't you?" "Can't say that I do," replied the mayor; "but I will take care that he writes no more for this house as long as he has anything to do with it, and so you may tell him."—The Works of Wit and Humour.

(Liberal Review.)

There are a good many people in the world who never give themselves a fair chance about undervalued abilities and virtues remain hidden from the eyes of the world. They work away most piously, pass them in the race of life. To this class of being belongs the muffin.

This speech may be a good one in itself, being full of logical argument and brilliant rhetoric; but it will appear tame and insipid, because delivered badly. It is equally certain that he makes a mess of the dramatic performance, and that the success is a failure. He loses his cue, forgets his part, stammers and stumbles, and betrays his nervousness by the awkwardness of his gait and his sheepish appearance. In every peal of laughter which is induced he sees a masked foe. When people chuckle at his "hits," he fancies they are laughing at him. He is not at all conscious of his mistakes, they are. Whenever there is a murmur, he feverishly imagines that he has done something wrong, or that there is something amiss with his dress. And he has this unfortunate knack of making it evident to everybody that his mind is haunted by these worrying doubts. He is not at all sure that he is by no means a fool. Give him work which he can perform when no one is looking on and he will get through it successfully and creditably. He will make no attempt to shrink. He would rather be set a task than set himself one, for he readily recognises the fact that it is his mission to follow rather than to lead. He is not a man of his own mind. His sensible scheme, but it is rarely induced that he comes out in the character of the proposer of one. He has no faith in his own individuality of power, and so he likes to shift responsibility on to sturdier shoulders than his own. He is generally willing to do any work, more from a sense of duty than from a well after, and kept up to the mark. His weakness of character and his generosity are, of course, traded upon to a very large extent. He is too often made the tool to help forward other men's schemes, and his resources taxed to an undue extent. When he is so employed he has, more from a sense of duty than from a well after, the simple reason that it is not known what he has done. Those who use him keep their own counsel, and he, through causes which will be evident, keeps his, too. He, somehow or other, in spite of this, manages to jolt through the world very comfortably. His is not one of those lives which are lived in such a manner that unless constantly plunging into fresh schemes, and seeking fresh fields in which to exercise the talents they feel lie within them. He is quite satisfied simply to jog along doing his duty. It is of such stuff as that of which muffs are made, men are constituted who contentedly remain a life-time in one situation—who are quite content to do the same thing, under the same circumstances, and in the same place, same circumstances. The muff has his pleasures, and he appreciates them. They are quiet pleasures; but they are none the less enjoyable for all that. He does not envy those who enjoy life in a more noisy and brilliant fashion than he does. He may, now and then, have a sigh, and wonder how it is that he was not born like such people, but the matter goes no further. He never resigns himself to his position. He is contently miserable when people take advantage of his weakness, and destroy his self-possession by bullying and riding rough-shod over him.

It is often a matter of surprise how many muffs manage to get married. But they frequently do so. Doubtless, they endure much mental agony before only to be conjectured, for the muff keeps matters very quiet until such time as it is publicly declared that he is "engaged." He receives the congratulations of friends on his good fortune, in a bashful, deprecatory manner, and objects to have the subject dwelt too largely upon. He will say nothing which will commit him, or may be turned into ridicule, for, of all the things in the world which he hates, the only one is that which he has as his wife as the lash does the gnat's back. To this man, no doubt, he traced the spot that, invariably, when he contemplates matrimony, he fakes all his old haunts and companions, until such time as his intention is made known to the world. He will never be discovered spooning or flirting in company, for he knows too well the "chaff" which his good deeds would bring him. And yet those who have known him and have studied his character can always see through him. As soon as he temporarily forsakes them, and assigns no reason, they know what is about to happen. The embarrassed lovers, whom one sees upon the stage, convey but a vague idea of his state of mind when "popping the question" to that prejudice which people's lips on their subjecting, which would be very unbecoming, and, at the same time, very unfeeling. For, after all, the world has but an imperfect conception of what most loved passages consist of. The majority of people's conceptions are founded upon their own experiences, or the idea—what a mistake!—that they would do under certain circumstances upon the supposition that they have been educated upon the same ground. Now, in certain circumstances, but it will not hold in others, for the simple reason that differently constituted men and women act differently under the same circumstances. And then it is very evident, in the majority of love scenes upon the stage, that they have been made to order.

It is one of the best features in the muff that he is firm in his friendships. Thus, if he makes few friends, he remains true to them as long as long as life. A good deal of enduring work may be got out of him, for, as has been hinted, he can work well when not exposed to general observation. He can paint good pictures, write good books, or solve difficult mathematical problems, though his public conduct might induce a very contrary belief in the minds of on-lookers. Altogether, he is often a very useful being, and the world would sustain substantial loss were his services to be discontinued. He does not deserve the comparative contempt with which he is regarded.

Vulgar People.
(General Location.)

By the above, we are allude to a certain class of men who are constantly, monkey-like, assuming a degree of gentility to which they have no earthly claim; but to convince them of this failing would be something like, use an old aphorism, "trying to stop the tide with a pitchfork." It's no of avail bringing forward the most convincing proofs that, notwithstanding all the pomp and circumstance, vulgarism still stamps indelibly their most trivial as well as their most important actions, and you are still in the same position as when you essayed to bring them round to your own sentiments; they either can't, or, much nearer truth, won't concede that you have read their real characters.

Conspicuous among such are retired tradesmen—who started life with the tide at the very lowest ebb, but by industry, close application to business, and unswerving determination to watch for and seize every opportunity that presented itself to advance their prospects, ultimately obtained a comfortable independence. The poor mother in her young days could bake, wash, sew, and mend; but now to teach such lessons to the daughters would be the extreme of vulgarity—no way considering the position of her children, in which they are as present imaginary shining stars. Another class of their life is noticeable in the constant seeking, with blind and most ridiculous vanity, for grand connections; they are impressed with the idea that to reckon on their list of friends even the cast-aside, well-pensioned mistress of a man of fashion with a high-sounding name and a hired carriage, augments an enormous extent of their social position in the acquaintance of that delightful half-pay, always half-sever, old naval officer who lives on the opposite side of their fashionable street, with young-looking wife and half a dozen grown-up daughters, and a like number of married-if-we-can-sons—the latter all boast a bombast, the young ladies with sufficient assurance to enable them to assume the airs of the fair, the countess—adornments which our would-be fashionables may take for the essence of good breeding, the olive branches of the ex-tallow chandeliers or greengrocer grow up, they are taught as one of their principal lessons in life to lock down upon and despise, as totally unworthy of their fashionable notice, the parents, respectively of the young ladies and sons, in position of wealth and independence. "Better business!" that was right enough for pa, but I'm a gentleman! I have often heard pass from the lips of youths who owed all they possessed to trade; and too often have we seen such youths, though in "middle age" the gentility of those about them in aiping age all the vulgar graces of a vulgar and ungentlemanly life, and who may materially assist in fostering and nurturing the above-mentioned ill, fallacious ideas found in individuals deriving subsistence from an appointment in some Government office or other (not, be it understood, the we even for a moment intend to cast the slightest stigma on place seekers and placemen as a whole, but only a small portion of the class), and who, in the language I have ascribed, which having most probably obtained more through interest than their merits, is considered as a sufficient reason for treating with contempt those who do not like themselves, live idly at the expense of others' labour and hard-earned savings. What is more common than to hear such speak of their father as "a governor" or "a minister," while the father himself is a fancy and anticipated their every childish want, as the "old woman" talk of the malice of their cast as the "build," and the unfortunate tailor who "built" it, and who, no doubt, called twenty times for his money and as many times was told "not at home" as their "rascal." Coming from such persons, of course such language cannot possibly

Another specimen is to be found in the class of young gentlemen who constantly indulge in the most sickening pretensions of refinement and grandeur, speaking of the actual possession of a carriage and footmen as indispensable to their happiness; if they are told things instead of facts, they are, it is the purpose of the poet, of the philosopher, of melody, but of which they invariably take care to impress upon your mind, to patronise—

We have known this actually said by a young man whose parents at one time filled a very mental position; but now are classified among our modern aristocracy, a position attained by the purchase of a title, and the purchase of a series of toys and rich, expensive, fashionable, aware, as they must be, of this themselves why do they for a moment encourage a course of vain bombast and vulgarity in the children which cannot but disgust every reasonable, thinking man? From a constant habit of viewing which each other in such out-and-out and unbecomingly vulgar terms, and of assuming as they fondly imagine, of the aristocracy the very tone of voice becomes changed, and it becomes an impossibility for them to spend half a dozen words without terminating their out of the six with a lary-sounding, droning "aw." An old school-fellow, who played a fiddle, whipped top, and joined in other pleasurable amusements, and who had assumed the garb of gentility, or, rather, before their parents threw aside the carriage and the footmen, met them in their daily walk with a pleasant "Good afternoon, George," and is greatly astonished to see his quondam companion adjust an eye-glass to his eye, and, in a few minutes, and then, with the utmost indifference, say, "Aw, he's a poor fellow; can't weally wnderstand. Don't know yew!"

It is astonishing how prevalent among this interesting section of the rising generation is an unusual ambition for the knowledge of subjects scientific and philosophical. According to some, zoology is their favourite study; others prefer chemistry; some, again geology, or botany. Unfortunately, it is only in names that they are distinguished; and, should them on either subject attainments; sound them on either subject, and you generally find a blank, a total want, which is excused by—"Aw, I can't just now call to mind." Others again—whether from rapping or from hearsay, it matters not—have so much admiration for poetry that every sentence they utter or write is interlarded with quotations from Scott, Moore, Byron, &c., and even go so far as to consider themselves worthy literary artists by indulging in occasional verses, which, being eulogical or complimentary, may happen to the poemers of some of our greatest poets, to the intense delight of their fond and rather foolish parents, who, with open ears and gleaming eyes, are in a perfect maze of delight and wonder at the astounding knowledge exhibited by their most errand children. Should it at all become necessary for any of these young hopefuls to enter life and make their own fortunes (although such an idea is generally selected when mooted), no trade is to be selected to attain such an end as nothing, less than a profession; their capabilities, extraordinary as might be, are not, and chief of all, general promptings, prevent any choice being made other than being bred as physicians, barristers, divines, or at least officers in the army. Competitive examination in the latter will probably be a great bar to our would-be gentility donning the martial uniform. 'Tis in this manner our professions are filled with half-starved penniless men, who, had they followed the trade which enabled their parents to am-wealth, would, no doubt, have followed their footsteps. But then, we forget, it is vulgar. Many such sons live in the hope of their fathers' death, and in many instances show their desire so palpably as to rob their parents' declining days of peace, by the acquisition of much needed repose, squander what they can of his hard-earned money, bring dishonor on his honest name, and then wonder, when the wished-for death-bed comes, that they are cut off with an angry shilling.

A Real Romance of War.

A story which is infinitely more romantic than the majority of those usually deemed good enough for dramatic purposes, is that of Henry Dillon, whose figures in the earlier scenes at least, being a Confederate general and a Federal soldier. This last, a named Henry Dillon, who is now the editor of a newspaper at Jackson, Miss., served in the Second New Jersey Cavalry, and accompanied his regiment on Grierson's famous raid through Mississippi. He was one of the few who escaped the fate of the rest of the Confederate General Stegman and one of the staff officers. Shots were exchanged, and general fell mortally wounded by a shot to the right. He took time for writing, and the regiment which was on his side, and from his bedside composed his will, bequeathing his property to his wife and daughter, and a life insurance policy for 50,000 dollars. He obtained a pledge from Dillon that he would forward the papers to the Stegman family, the first opportunity which presented itself, and these reached the latter in full accordance with his promise. After the war, he advertised in the papers for the owners, and at last resolved to keep the papers until some inquiry should be made for them. This was lately accomplished, and the papers were advertised, and the German papers for information of the possessor of his father's will, and offering $500,000 for the recovery. Dillon immediately replied to the offer, and the estate was recovered, and he recovered the precious document, and expressed his deep gratitude to its custodian. He said that the estates in Alabama and Georgia had been sold, and that the money was needed to make good their claim as well as $300,000, though litigation had previously arisen on "the production of a forged will of some main relative of the deceased general, and the fact that the money was for the further liquidation of an enterprise in which he had been engaged, but that he would not further liquidation but that he would invest it in the stock market. It only remains to add that this Federal soldier gallantly distinguished himself in the battle of Gettysburg, and that the soldiers to whom Congress voted a gold medal for bravery.
